The objective of the combustor in a gas turbine is to add energy to the system to power the turbines, and produce a high velocity gas to exhaust through the nozzle in aircraft applications. As with any engineering challenge, accomplishing this requires balancing many design considerations, such as the following:

The blade profile for a turbomachine is being chosen through aerodynamics requirements on their properties in a catalog of the airfoils. In cases thin blade profile and low camber be can come from a base airfoils 1 that are use in aerodynamic wing airfoils, in other cases shapes of the blade profiles be can come from experimentaly blade profiles that are tested inside the line blade row.
